FAIL TO SNAP INNER CORONA AS FOCUSED THROUGH GIANT TELESCOPE; SKETCH OUTLINED

ITHACA, Jan. 24.—Astronomers, making observations at Cornell University, were successful in taking photographs of the eclipse but failed to "snap" the inner corona as focused through the giant telescope. A continuation of the observations, however, were taken by the scientists under perfect atmospheric conditions, making it possible of the outer corona and the spectrum. They had intended to make six exposures of the inner corona during totality. The approximate start of the totality here was 9:04:10 and it lasted for one minute, 16 7-16 seconds.

The sky was absolutely cloudless during the totality, making the conditions ideal for scientific observations and taking.

With the exception of the first corona, the rest of the corona was not seen. The first corona was partially obscured by the sun and the sun was low in the sky.

Following poor weather, Louis Agassiz, astronomer, artist and member of the Cornell University faculty, occupied a point of vantage on Bald Hill, one of the highest elevations in the Finger Lakes region, where he sketched an outline of the eclipse for an oil painting.
